Chapter 2 - North to the Back Door (pp. 37-38) Hay-ya, hay-ya, mel-lo ... So the people began their migrations, climbing up a high mountain. They were accompanied by two insect people resembling the katydid or locust, the mǎjhu [insect which has the heat power]. On top they met a great bird, the eagle. One of the mǎjhus, acting as a spokesman for the people, asked the eagle, "Have you been living here very long?" "Yes," replied the eagle, "since the creation of this Fourth world." "We have traveled a long way to reach this new land," said the mǎjhu. "Will you permit us to live here with you?" "Perhaps," answered the eagle. "But I must test you first." Drawing out one of his arrows he was holding in his claws, he ordered the two mǎjhus to step closer. To one he said, "I am going to poke this arrow into your eyes. If you do not close them, you and all the people who follow you may remain here." Whereupon he poked the point of the arrow so close to the mǎjhu's eye it almost touched, but the mǎjhu did not blink. "You are a people of great strength," observed the eagle. "But the second test is much harder and I don't believe you will pass it." "We are ready for the second test," said the two mǎjhus. The eagle pulled out a bow, cocked an arrow, and shot the first mǎjhu through the body. The mǎjhu, with the arrow sticking out one side of him, lifted the flute he had brought with him and began to play a sweet and tender melody. "Well!" said the eagle. "You have more power than I thought!" So he shot the other mĀjhu with a second arrow.
